Reflections – ‘come Tuesday mornings the village turns into either a recycling city or domestic waste site as all the bags, boxes, wheelie bins and dustbins are put out. On seeing this it got me thinking about where would all this waste have gone before we had dust lorries collecting our waste.

Living in the village as long as I have and walking the local area for many years, it became quite apparent that residents took their unwanted items and waste to old quarries where they tipped it over the granite edge. My boys came home many a time with items they had found locally. In the old part of the village where the newest house has been built was another dumping area where many an old bottle and marmalade pottery pot was found or dug up. Bottles often stick out of granite walls and are brought home for cleaning up. One of the best finds was along a path at Trevone where for many years the household rubbish was thrown on a piece of waste ground and we found printed milk bottles, some being 2 pints with the Dairy’s name for all to read. A set of tiles from a fireplace lay there one day and the colours of the flowers on the tiles were beautiful.

The old track that runs from the back of the old village between a cottage and a bungalow, down to an old quarry and the Argal Reservoir still has the remains buried of old iron bedsteads, the gas lights from the Treverva Chapel and bits of farming implements that have taken years to rust away’.

And talking of Treverva Chapel – you may or may not know that the chapel is, once again, up for sale (together with planning permission for a residential dwelling). The majority of the contents have been sold via sealed bids. However, the good news is that the organ is to remain in Cornwall and will be relocated at Poldark Mine.

Also, the brass ‘in memorium’ plaque the ‘Roll of Honour’ from the Chapel has been given to the village hall and once cleaned up, it will be placed in Treverva Village Hall as a reminder of those from the Parish who made the ultimate sacrifice in the Great War.
